One of the main reasons that Donald Trump was so hated by the Washington machine on both sides during the campaign in 2016 was his opposition to the neo-liberal foreign policy consensus of endless war, foreign aid, and the neo-cold war with Russia. War is profitable, peace is not, always remember that. The military industrial complex was not something dreamed up by the anti-war hippies in the Vietnam War era as they were sniffing paint chips. This complex is a collection of monied interests bent on using the largely non-existent and manufactured threat of terrorism, mass invasion or nuclear Armageddon to make money. Such entities include the intelligence community, the surveillance state, weapons dealers, banks, big tech in Silicon Valley, the militarized police apparatus, and the Pentagon. The vast majority of the federal budget goes to the military and most of that to the Pentagon, which like the Federal Reserve, has never been audited. No one knows what the Pentagon uses their money for exactly, besides bombs and endless war.

The reason Pelosi and the Democrats impeached Trump is because he made a phone call to the Ukraine, threatening supposedly to withhold military aid if they didn't investigate Hunter Biden's lucrative profiteering with energy company Burisma. It was later proved, like Russian collusion, meddling and election hacking to be totally made up. As the days and weeks go by, more evidence comes to light regarding Russiagate and its true origins.

> In the nearly four years since they were published, many of the unverified allegations about President Trump compiled by former British spy Christopher Steele have been widely discredited, including by Special Counsel Robert Mueller 's investigation of Russian meddling in the 2016 U.S. election. Yet the source of some of the most critical allegations in that dossier and how they reached Mr. Steele have remained a mystery.

We know that the Steele Dossier was opposition research and true foreign meddling, in the sense that it came from a foreign spy.

> A Wall Street Journal investigation provides an answer: a 40-year-old Russian public-relations executive named Olga Galkina fed notes to a friend and former schoolmate who worked for Mr. Steele. The Journal relied on interviews, law-enforcement records, declassified documents and the identification of Ms. Galkina by a former top U.S. national security official. In 2016, Ms. Galkina was working in Cyprus at an affiliate of XBT Holding SA, a web-services company best known for its Webzilla internet hosting unit. XBT is owned by Russian internet entrepreneur Aleksej Gubarev. That summer, she received a request from an employee of Mr. Steele to help unearth potentially compromising information on then-presidential candidate Donald Trump 's links to Russia, according to people familiar with the matter. Ms. Galkina was friends with the employee, Igor Danchenko, since their school days in Perm, a Russian provincial city near the Ural mountains.

As a recap, the primal source for the Russia collusion narrative is a Russian! You can't make this stuff up. But the question remains what exactly Ms. Galkina was privy to, or what allegedly, anyway?

> Ms. Galkina was the source, for instance, of the dossier's contention that Webzilla played a central role in the 2016 hacking of the Democratic National Committee, according to people familiar with the matter. The release of emails stolen from the Democratic Party leadership roiled the presidential campaign. She was also responsible for the mention of Mr. Gubarev in the dossier as a hacking expert recruited under duress by Russian security services, these people said. Likewise, she was behind the dossier's assertion that Mr. Trump's lawyer, Michael Cohen, and Russian intelligence officials, held a secret meeting in Prague in the summer of 2016 to discuss how to pay the hackers and cover up their work, the people said.

Ms. Galkina, who is a Russian, was behind some of the most damning indictments of President Trump as it relates to the Russia investigation. And it turns out, they are all lies. But why was this so important to Democrats. Recall the impeachment process, that the Speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, is the one who presided over the impeachment vote. This vote is a simple majority, which the Democrats had at the time of the vote. Impeachment does not mean conviction or removal from office, it simply shifts the matter to the Senate for a trial, which Mitch McConnell summarily dismissed as absurd. And this brings us full circle to the question of money and the monied interests at work: were there any regarding impeachment?

> The cybersecurity firm CrowdStrike rose to global prominence in mid-June 2016 when it publicly accused Russia of hacking the Democratic National Committee and stealing its data. The previously unknown company's explosive allegation set off a seismic chain of events that engulfs U.S. national politics to this day. The Hillary Clinton campaign seized on CrowdStrike's claim by accusing Russia of meddling in the election to help Donald Trump. U.S. intelligence officials would soon also endorse CrowdStrike's allegation and pursue what amounted to a multi-year, all-consuming investigation of Russian interference and Trump's potential complicity. With the next presidential election now in its final weeks, the Democrats' national leader, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, and her husband, Paul Pelosi, are endorsing the publicly traded firm in a different way. Recent financial disclosure filings show the couple have invested up to $1 million in CrowdStrike Holdings. The Pelosis purchased the stock at a share price of $129.25 on Sept. 3. At the time of this article's publication, the price has risen to $142.97.

By impeaching Trump, Pelosi was essentially engaging in a type of insider trading and market manipulation. A similar story can be told about Kelly Loeffler, the Republican Georgia Senator appointed by Republican Governor Brian Kemp to replace Johnny Isakson after he stepped down for health reasons. Loeffler was accused of insider trading because she dumped her stocks after attending a private meeting in January of this year regarding the Covid pandemic. The timing was too perfect, which triggered an ethics investigation, and because the Republicans controlled the Senate, went nowhere. But the story is the same: our elected officials are profiting off war, pain and suffering during Covid and the Russiagate hoax.

In conclusion, Dominion Voting Systems sent what are essentially cease and desist letters to conservative media outlets regarding their claims of election fraud by their software.

> A law firm representing Dominion Voting Systems has sent letters to conservative channels Fox News, Newsmax, and One America News warning them of their intention to pursue legal action over the false election fraud claims made on their airwaves. "I think it's fair to say in January we will be pulling the trigger on multiple litigation matters. The damage that they've done has already been enormous," libel attorney Tom Clare said about the networks airing blatant falsehoods about voter fraud. "The time for a retraction is not now it was weeks ago. I'm certain a retraction does not undo the damage but it's the right thing regardless of litigation," Clare added.

Exit, election fraud.
